

Australian Domestic & Family Violence Clearinghouse

NEWSLETTER NO 29 – WINTER 2007

Access and Equity Equals Best Practice

Chris Jennings

Violence Against Women with Disabilities Project, Domestic Violence & Incest Resource Centre, Victoria

Good practice begins with acknowledging the problem

An understanding of fundamental concepts such as human rights, feminist analysis, principles of social justice and an in-depth understanding of domestic and family violence is central to good practice in domestic and family violence services (Domestic Violence Victoria [DV VIC] 2006).

Women with disabilities are, from the government record, one of the most marginalised, neglected and isolated groups in society. They can suffer manifold discrimination – female, disabled, and often poor – and this can be compounded further by intersections of race and culture (WWDA 2007). Women with disabilities remain largely invisible and voiceless, ignored by national policies and laws, even though they face multiple forms of discrimination, structural poverty and social exclusion (UNFPA 2005; WWDA 2007). When we put disability and gender together we can have an oppressive cocktail. Women with disabilities are often considered to be ‘asexual’ and therefore unlikely to be targets of domestic or family violence. Consequently, legislation, policy and services developed by society to combat domestic and family violence demonstrate denial and indifference to the reality of violence against women with disabilities (Calderbank 2000; WWDA 2007).

Researchers have found that compared to non-disabled women, women with disabilities (Calderbank 2000; Jennings 2004; WWDA 2007):

- experience violence at higher rates and frequently are at a significantly higher risk of violence,
- have considerably fewer pathways to safety,
- tend to be subjected to violence for significantly longer periods of time,
- experience violence that is more diverse in nature and
- experience violence at the hands of greater numbers of perpetrators.

A recent report by VicHealth (2004) found that domestic violence is the biggest single health risk factor for women aged between 15 and 44 years. It is also the biggest single cause of early death and disability. Although many are aware that violence causes death, there is less awareness that domestic violence can also cause disability.

Good practice is when an individual worker and a service they work for familiarises themselves with these alarming facts and makes a commitment to take action

Women with disabilities in this country experience extremely high levels of violence but this is not reflected in data about service use or in their access to services. Every day that issues of access are ignored is a day when many women with disabilities are denied their fundamental right to live free of violence (Jennings 2004).

Services and practitioners specialising in gender-based violence need to understand that they are in the best position to offer validation and support to women with disabilities who experience violence. Workers have the knowledge and expertise in supporting women and children. The problem is the violence, not the woman's disability (Jennings 2003).

Good practice is improving service access for women with disabilities.

If a service is physically inaccessible and budget constraints mean that it is unlikely the service will become fully accessible in the foreseeable future, does this service have a role in supporting women with disabilities? In short, YES. Services have both an ethical and legal responsibility not to discriminate on the basis of disability. If a service's core business is domestic and family violence, then the service's core business includes women with disabilities who experience such violence. Domestic and family violence services need to become part of a sustainable solution - all services advocating for inclusive service access and support and justice for all victims and survivors.

Services need to acknowledge any barriers to access within their service and strategically plan for future inclusive service practices and policies. One of the barriers to access can be the attitudes of workers. Regular service review, professional development plans and regular supervision provide opportunities to challenge and address these attitudes. Reflective practice on an individual level and a team level can also be used as a proactive strategy to challenge and address such attitudes in a supportive environment (DV VIC 2006).

Services should have a goal of keeping service delivery and support flexible to accommodate a variety of possible requests. It is impossible to make blanket changes that will make your service accessible to all women with disabilities. Services should remain open to changes that are necessary, based on individual preference and need.

Services should examine the barriers within their organisations to victims with disabilities, through client feedback, data analysis, service evaluation and consideration of their local community demography. Services need to ask: How many women with disabilities live in the local community? What percentage of those women are likely to have experienced some form of domestic and family violence? And most importantly: How many of those women with disabilities has the service provided support to in the past month, quarter or year?

Good practice is developing service information which is accessible to women with disabilities

Women with disabilities need to get the message that violence perpetrated against them is not acceptable.

Providing accessible information highlights a positive attitude towards women with a disability. For women with disabilities, it will increase their confidence in, and awareness of, the support available.

Development of all service information in plain English for women with cognitive disabilities immediately improves access for women with low literacy, and for women with English as a second language. It also makes it easier for information to be translated, lowering costs. Following readability guidelines (such as those developed by Vision Australia) and adhering to website accessibility principles also make information more accessible.

Good practice is extending an understanding of domestic and family violence to include a definition that encompasses experiences of women with disabilities

Among women with disabilities, domestic violence can occur between intimate partners, just as it does among women without disabilities. However, women with disabilities also face alarming rates of violence from paid and non-paid carers. To effectively provide services to this marginalised group of women, workers must recognise that the perpetrators also include those who provide personal care. Any understanding of 'family' or 'domestic relationship' must reflect the diverse types of domestic relationships that women with disabilities may have. This directly affects how eligibility for services is assessed and the development of prevention strategies.

Good practice is facilitating collaborative partnerships between domestic and family violence and disability programs

Domestic and family violence services committed to improving their service response to women with disabilities will look at collaboration with other agencies. Partnerships which focus specially on addressing the additional barriers faced by women with disabilities, are crucial to the successful implementation of an integrated response.

Working collaboratively with other community organisations to facilitate safety planning, for example, may be particularly important where the perpetrator is the primary carer. Few of the strategies for women commonly listed in generic safety plans are feasible for a woman who must depend on her abuser to get her out of bed in the morning, dress and feed her; or for a woman who is reliant on transport that, even when booked in advance, may arrive three hours late (Jennings 2003).

Good practice is data collection

There is a dearth of organised, systematically retrievable statistical information about Australian women with disabilities. In the current political climate, statistics are the language of persuasion. Decision-makers tend to take more notice of these than they do of reports based on anecdotal evidence. Women with disabilities need organisations' support to get issues affecting their lives on the political agenda.

Good practice is to collect service data that includes recording all contact with women with disabilities, the nature of the contact and the nature of their disability.

Good practice is documenting women's experience of service access

The collection of data is a sound beginning, however, domestic and family violence services need to document any limitations and challenges faced by their service in their attempts to assist women with disabilities. Agencies also need to fully document the strategies they have successfully utilised to overcome any challenges faced in providing a service to women with disabilities. This documentation would provide an important basis for the service's reflective practice and continuous improvement. This analysis could also make an enormous contribution to the collective lobbying for a more equitable response to women with disabilities, who experience domestic and family violence. Systemic change, policy development and sector planning that is more inclusive of the experience of women with disabilities is needed.

Good practice is prioritising women with disabilities

Services and workers need to recognise the high levels of gender-based violence experienced by women with disabilities, along with their historically poor service access to domestic and family violence services. This would ensure that these women and their children receive particular consideration.

Good practice is thinking innovatively and researching interventions that are effective for women with disabilities

The domestic and family violence sector needs to engage with the complex issues around violence, women with disabilities and effective support. It needs to identify and develop effective methods of working towards the prevention of violence and how to adequately provide support to women with disabilities.

Conclusion

It is critical that any response to violence recognises the needs of all women and children. An understanding of individual needs and differences is important for a respectful and considered response. Women with disabilities have been subjected to power, policies and practices that have defined them in very narrow ways and precluded a consideration of them as individuals. Services must be designed and delivered to take into account the diverse needs and experiences of all women (Jennings 2004).

References

- Calderbank, R 2000, 'Abuse and Disabled People: vulnerability or social indifference?', Disability & Society, vol.15, no 3, pp. 521-534
- Domestic Violence Victoria 2006, 'Enhancing the safety of women and children in Victoria', Code of Practice for Specialist Family Violence Services for Women and Children, DV VIC, Melbourne
- Jennings, C 2003, 'Triple Disadvantage: Out of Sight Out of Mind - DVIRC Violence Against Women With Disabilities Project Report, DVIRC, Melbourne
- Jennings, C 2004, 'At Greater Risk', Parity, vol.17 Issue 4
- United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA) 2005 State of World Population 2005: The Promise of Equality – Gender Equality, Reproductive Health and The Millennium Development Goal, UNFPA, New York, USA
- VicHealth 2004 The Health Costs of Violence: Measuring the burden of disease caused by intimate partner violence, VicHealth in partnership with the Department of Human Services, Melbourne
- WWDA 2007, 'Review of South Australian Laws' Submission to the South Australian Government

INTERNET SITES

Building knowledge on policing - Australasian Police KnowledgeNET site goes live

A new website has been launched to build knowledge around policing in Australia and the region. Established by the Australasian Police Professional Standards Council, the site provides a wide variety of research and evidence to develop and support community safety initiatives. It includes forums, document database, articles, links and a research project database.

See Australasian Police KnowledgeNET at:
http://www.appsc.com.au/vb/cms_index.php

Internet support for advocates for children who live with violence

Kids In Distress Inc provides a website for supporters and advocates for children who are victims of abuse. The site provides information and background on issues related to violence against children, with a focus on family law, where there are allegations of child abuse.

See <http://www.kidsindistress.org.au>

© Copyright 2007 • Australian Domestic & Family Violence Clearinghouse